There is a theory held by some criminologists that evil eventually melts out of the body. That if you warehouse a man in jail long enough, he¹ will become harmless. Youth's passions dim. Perversion's fires cool. It is this theory that Lawrence Singleton contested last week.

Last Wednesday a painter saw a struggle while working on a house in Tampa's suburb. Inside, a naked man appeared to be trying to kill a naked woman. The witness called the 911 emergency number, and when a police officer arrived at the door, he² was met by an apparition. Lawrence Singleton "came out of the house staggering. His³ shirt was unbuttoned, and he⁴ had blood all over his⁵ chest." Apparently drunk, he⁶ announced that he⁷ had cut himself chopping vegetables.

But when he⁸ moved casually to answer a ringing phone, the officer saw a bloodied naked corpse on his⁹ living-room floor. After his¹⁰ arrest, Singleton, 69, declared to reporters, "They framed me¹¹ the first time. But this time I did it."

In fact, Singleton is notorious for "the first time." In 1978 a 15-year-old runaway named Mary Vincent got a ride outside San Francisco with a man in a van. The man approached her¹² sexually, moved away, but later - having liquored up - beat her¹³, bound her¹⁴ and raped her¹⁵ twice. He¹⁶ chopped off her¹⁷ arms and left her¹⁸ in a concrete culvert to die. She¹⁹ didn't. The next day, Vincent was found "wandering nude ... holding up her²⁰ arms so that the muscles and blood would not fall out." When Singleton, a merchant mariner, was sentenced for the crime, the judge said he²¹ wished he²² could "send him²³ to prison for the rest of his²⁴ natural life."
